Writing your Literature Review: Linking to Methodology

Wednesday, 11th June 2008
9.30am – 12.30pm
E105/106 | Kelvin Grove Campus

Because of the illness of the presenter this event has been rescheduled to this date. If you have registered and can no longer come then please go to the website, login, and withdraw from this event, so those who can come are able to register.

Registration is essential. Click on the link: <http://www.rsctraining.qut.edu.au/default.aspx> and follow the instructions to login and register. RSVP by Friday, 6th June; having difficulties? Ph: 313 82195.

Intended audience:

This workshop is intended for anyone who is in the process of writing a literature review. Join this workshop and learn (or refresh your memory about) how to write a quality literature review. You will also have an opportunity to discuss the issues relevant to you with respect to your own literature review.

Session objectives:

This interactive workshop will take you through the tips and techniques to get the most out of the following:

- Reading and writing with a purpose.
- How do I relate my literature to methodology?
- What is a systematic literature review? Will a systematic literature review help me write a quality literature review with appropriate evidence to support my thesis?
- What are some tips and tricks to help write a literature review that synthesises all the information I have found?
- An opportunity to get help on writing your own literature review.

One of the aims of the Research Students Centre is to enable you to develop writing skills that will be useful for your academic career. As well as being provided with information, in this workshop you will work at writing your own quality literature review.

It will be helpful if you have already written a draft literature review that is relevant to your own research topic. Please bring it along as there will be an opportunity to use it in practising building a conceptual framework.

Facilitator:

Professor Tom Cooper – Faculty of Education
